Chairman Irvine then vacated the chair in favor of Judge M. M. Kellogg, who assumed the presidency of the convention amid applause. The Judge made a happy speech, in which he paid his compliments to the convention for the honor conferred upon him. He congratulated the delegates that the time had arrived for the fighting out of the political battles on party lines. All he wanted was an honest govern-ment, and this he believed to be pure Democracy. He paid a compliment to the Cleveland administration for the fearless administration of the government, and sat down amid a storm of

"I think this an insult," she was quoted as saying. "I will never accept such an offer as long as I can earn a living, and while I am not askamed of Chaska. I love him dearly, I think too much of my friends and parents too much of my friends and parents to make a dime museum exhibition of myself." Then she filled out a telegraph blank as follows:

"I can't entertain your proposition. I speak for Chaska, my husband."

Notwithstanding this, however, she, in company with her husband and baby filled an engagement shortly afterward at both the West and the South side museums in Chicago.
